

food system change
online congress

Community Gardens

Community gardens are gardens which are collectively run by a group of people (usually not with a professional background in gardening) and are often located in city centres using fallow areas.

- more independence from global food markets
- radically local production by citizens themselves
- knowledge and skill sharing space for food sustainability topics
- experimenting with new forms of community-building and neighbourhood solidarity sustainability potential

